

This issue brought to you by:

Clarke Langrall, CEPA

clarke@forecastadvisors.com

Forecast Strategic Advisors

600 Fairmount Avenue

Towson, MD 21286

<http://www.forecastadvisors.com>

410-583-1777

Avoiding Unwanted Surprises

For some business owners, a third-party sale is their best option for a successful business exit. Third-party sales are popular because owners often believe they can get the most money from their businesses in as little time as possible from a third-party buyer. They might be right. But what they may not consider is how little control they have over their businesses, their schedules, and even their futures once the third-party sale process begins. Consider the following case study:

After 35 years of building a successful manufacturing company, which employed about 100 people, Lemont Lemieux was ready to retire. Always a do-it-yourselfer, Lemont had hired a business valuation specialist; found an interested buyer; assembled a deal team consisting of a business broker, deal attorney, and his company's CPA; and, most Lemont and Trinity were ready to travel.

One day, Lemont's business broker called him and said, "We worked out a final deal that will get you the $7 million [after taxes and fees] that you said you wanted. The buyer said they want to have this deal finalized as soon as possible so they can start integrating your systems into theirs and begin the management reorganization process."

"Management reorganization process?" Lemont asked.

"Right. The buyer plans to shut down your local operations. They'll move your equipment and maybe a few employees to their nearest facility, where there's excess capacity. After their site visit at your plant, they identified three employees from your company they want to interview to oversee operations in that line, so one of them will most likely get the job."

"Why wasn't I involved in this discussion?" Lemont asked. "I never wanted to have operations here shut down. I've got a lot of longtime employees. I've got managers that built their careers working their way up in the company."

"You never told me about wanting to protect your employees. You've only talked about wanting to get out this year, so that's what we aimed to do," replied the business broker.

Lemont's situation is only one example of how third-party sales can be trickier and more complex than owners expect because there are factors that owners simply don't consider. The deal team handles most of the process and does everything it can to get as much money on the best terms possible. But the deal team may not be focused on an owner's broader objectives for the sale. With this in mind, there are three things you can do to stay in control of the process throughout.

- 1. Have your Exit Objectives in mind.

A thorough assessment of your complete goals and objectives uncovers issues and interests you may not realize are important.

- 2. Build and preserve your management team.

3. Create a comprehensive Exit Plan before putting the company on the market.

Planning in advance of a third-party sale shines light on the connections between your exit and the future for your business, your employees, your family, and possibly your neighbors.

If a third-party sale is the Exit Path you're considering, contact us today to make sure that your interests are represented throughout the process of exiting your business.

The information contained in this article is general in nature and is not legal, tax or financial advice. For information regarding your particular situation, contact an attorney or a tax or financial advisor. The information in this newsletter is provided with the understanding that it does not render legal, accounting, tax or financial advice. In specific cases, clients should consult their legal, accounting, tax or financial advisor. This article is not intended to give advice or to represent our firm as being qualified to give advice in all areas of professional services. Exit Planning is a discipline that typically requires the collaboration of multiple professional advisors. To the extent that our firm does not have the expertise required on a particular matter, we will always work closely with you to help you gain access to the resources and professional advice that you need.

This is an opt-in newsletter published by Business Enterprise Institute, Inc., and presented to you by our firm. We appreciate your interest.

Any examples provided are hypothetical and for illustrative purposes only. Examples include fictitious names and do not represent any particular person or entity.

The information contained in this article is general in nature and is not legal advice. For information regarding your particular situation, contact an attorney or tax advisor. This newsletter is believed to provide accurate and authoritative information related to the subject matter. The accuracy of the information is not guaranteed and is provided with the understanding that none of the providers of this newsletter, including Business Enterprise Institute, Inc., is rendering legal, accounting or tax advice. In specific cases, clients should consult their legal, accounting or tax advisors.

Forward to Friend

Subscribe

Past Issues

RSS

subscribe to this list unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences